Meet-and-Greet With:

James "Bobo" Fey

Bobo was born and raised in Manhattan Beach, CA, and has been interested in the bigfoot mystery for as long as he can remember. Every choice in his life centered around his chances to see a sasquatch—surfing in Northern California, going to college in Palo Alto, and even touring as a roadie with the band Sublime allowed him to visit bigfoot habitats & interview people across the country about the elusive creature. In 2001, he saw his first bigfoot while on an investigation with researcher John Freitas. Today, Bobo makes his living as a commercial fisherman, always keeping his ear to the ground for bigfoot sightings and collecting dozens of reports each year.

Dr. Jeff Meldrum

Trained in the anatomical sciences with an emphasis in physical anthropology, Dr. Meldrum teaches human regional and sectional anatomy, evolution, and primate studies at Idaho State University. He has published extensively on the evolutionary history of the South American primates and has described several new extinct species. His interests in the footprints attributed to an unrecognized North American ape, commonly known as sasquatch, came into focus when he literally crossed paths with an enigmatic set of tracks in the mountains of southeastern Washington State. He has conducted collaborative laboratory research and field work throughout the Pacific Northwest and Intermountain West, as well as in Canada, China and Russia, and has been heard on NPR's Science Friday and Radio West, and seen on The Today Show, National Geographic, Discovery, History, SyFy, AnimalPlanet, and more. He was a featured scientist in Scientific American and the national AAAS webpage. His book, "Sasquatch: Legend Meets Science," has been described as the best discussion of the legendary primate available. He edits online refereed journal The Relict Hominoid Inquiry (www.isu.edu/rhi).
